John Cook, a teenage male worker at an industrial village up north of England, was proclaimed dead by family and coworkers Saturday evening.

Police found Cook overdosed with anaesthetic, along with his corpse being covered by blood, laid on a kitchen table. Cook's left arm was found disassembled from his body, and left on the grounds where the Buzz Saw was located at (see left).

An autopsy, was ordered to determine the exact cause of death. 'It is unknown whether it was Cook's immense blood loss or the anaesthesia received by Cook moments before his unfortunate passing, that led to Cook's untimely death,' a police spokesman said.

Saturday's incident took place in the Cook's household's woodcraft facility. Where young John was assigned to work a complex chainsaw, without being under supervision of a qualified adult. Cook was said to have accidentally slid his hand onto the buzz saw while chopping wood for his sister to cook food in the stove. The said buzzsaw violently shredded his left arm off his body, causing a large outburst of blood from his arteries. His family members were shown to have provided Cook with enormous supplies of anaesthetic when laying Cook's body down, in which medical authorities reported the anaesthetic could have caused deadly side effects to Cook.

There has been huge controversy on what the real cause of the late Cook's death is.

'Today was just a regular day at work for all of us,' Cook's coworker, K. Johnson claimed, 'We were all just minding our own businesses, packing up after a long day of work when the saddening event happened.' Other coworkers also supported Johnson's statement, laying claims that they had no idea what exactly happened.

Police officers indicated that Cook's family members could have taken a crucial part in leading up to the untimely death of John Cook.

When asked about why no one took the initiative to stop John Cook's bleeding and ask for help from medical authorities immediately, Cook's household gave no answers, and only repeatedly mentioned how John Cook 'gave his hand to the buzz saw'. They do not accept any responsibility to the death of John Cook, claiming deaths are a norm in the woodcrafts industry.

Further investigations are taking place to determine the cause of Cook's death, as well as the involvement of Cook's family members and coworkers.

Young boy dies under the buzz saw

In the mountainous state of Vermont, in New England, a boy was cutting firewood with a buzz saw in early evening .

Under his parent's command , he worked with the saw for an extra half hour of time. As his sister stood beside him ,and announce that it was time for dinner. As though it was reacting to her announcement, the saw seemed to jump out at the boy—but in reality, it must have been that the boy slipped. Whichever way it happened, the saw and hand made contact, and the boy's hand was cut.

In shock, the boy laughed nervously before turning towards his family, holding his hand aloft in a way that was half looking for help and half trying to keep the blood from gushing out. The boy begged his sister not to let the soon-to-arrive doctor to amputate his hand . But the hand was already lost.
